CEO Message

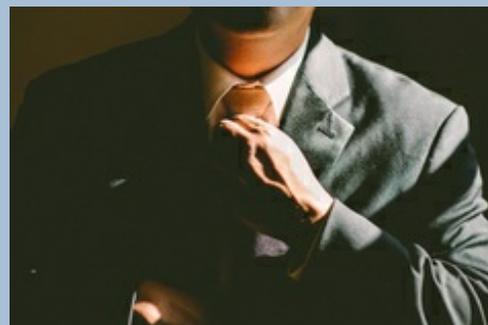

May is ending soon and June will be here in no time. Can you believe that almost the first half of the year is going to be over soon? Unbelievable, but true! What have you done in 2016 to take your project management career to the next level? I recently attended the Global Scrum Gathering in Orlando in April, which was one of my career goals for 2016. At this gathering, I not only gained useful knowledge about Agile/Scrum and expanded my network, but attending this gathering also paved the way for me to achieve my CSP certification. With June just around the corner, it's high time to reflect on your 2016 goals, plan how you're going to get there, and take action! Good luck!

Changing Careers: Business Analyst to Project Manager

The business analyst (BA) and the project manager (PM) each fill critical roles on projects. Business analysts lead requirements gathering, solutions generation, and communication with business users, while project managers lead the project from initiation and planning to executing, monitoring and controlling, and closing. With these factors in play, how can a business analyst transition effectively to a project manager role? | Read More

Performance Measurement Using Earned Value Management

Project managers need to dedicate themselves to constant learning. In this article, we continue a series of techniques that project managers can apply to take their skills to the next level. Earned Value Management (EVM) including variances, performance indices, and forecasting metrics, will be discussed. Mastering these skills will help project managers take the next step in their careers. | Read More
